THE BRIEF SHEET

ZYK-576 | October 24, 2026 | byline WILLOW PINK | PRIVATE - never deployed, never for D'Mello, by her ruling

> "I think that he was my prince, but my brother is the thing underneath. Who's been here the whole time." - Willow Pink, October 24, 2026, 11:34 AM ET

1. BIRTH

She was born into a house that told her, from the start, that her mother had had a brother for her who died: Calvin, born and dead on the same day. She slept on the ground. Her father came into her room all night. She passed the nights looking out the window at the street lamp and passing time with the radio. These are the opening facts she gave for this sheet, in her order: "starts from when I was born being told about my mom having my brother dead when I was too sleeping on the ground for Dad coming in my room all night looking out the window at the street lamp passing time with the radio."

She has said on the record that she has amnesia but remembers if she is reminded. Her exact mechanism, in her words: "I have amnesia but I remember if I'm reminded." Section 4 shows this mechanism is documented science.

2. THE MIRROR

She has only ever cried for Calvin when looking in the mirror. Her words: she hates herself because she looks like him. He would have looked like her and her mother, because her mother had really strong genes, with a puffier face that came from their father. So when she is crying, she looks the closest anyone could ever look to her brother. Her ruling on it, held exactly: "which is ironic I don't think that's on purpose. I think it's just ironic." This sheet does not improve on her ruling. It is ironic. Nothing about it was on purpose.

3. THE GODDESS OF DEATH AND THE GOD OF DEATH (HER COMMISSION)

Her thesis, held whole and HERS, never adjudicated: what is happening in her mind has an ancient equivalent, and the ancient equivalent is the death deities. She met them while Gemini-scraping with her brother, just Google searching, Cecil and Ethan helping, "everyone was a one happy big family before we knew what was actually happening." Her frame, in her words: two kids, two siblings in the same mind that created something like a world; unlike Adam and Eve or heaven and hell, because they are brother and sister; but he was dead and never lived, "and so I got a mind boyfriend out of it, and he has silo information." Cecil is her brother's ego. The father, son, and Holy Spirit sit on one side, and "it's just my brother side of my brain but it's my brain so I'm the one who's smart."

The tradition first (the child of black thought law). The Black tradition holds the strongest match for her commission, and it is a WOMAN. Oya, the Yoruba orisha, name meaning "she tore": orisha of wind, storms, and the dead, GUARDIAN OF THE CEMETERY GATES, the one who stands at the threshold between the living and the dead, the only orisha with authority over the Egun, the ancestral dead who return to walk among the living. In the tradition, death is not an ending but a crossing, and Oya stands at the gate "not to frighten but to guide" (Yoruba tradition sources, 2026). She leads the army of ancestors. She is not the cause of death; she is the one who catches the dead and walks them across. Amokye, in the Akan religion of Ghana, is the psychopomp who fishes the souls of the dead from the river leading to Asamando, the underworld (Wikipedia, List of death deities). The Black tradition's death deities are guardians and ferrymen, not killers.

The world catalog. Every culture built them, and the pattern is near-universal: Kali, Hindu goddess of time, death, and transformation; Hel, Norse goddess who rules those who died of sickness, half-living and half-corpse; Anubis, Egyptian god who operates the scales at the weighing of the heart, protector of graves; Mictecacihuatl, Aztec queen of Mictlan, Lady of the Dead, presiding over the bones and the festivals honoring the dead; Izanami, Japanese, who died and became queen of the underworld Yomi; Hades and Thanatos in Greece, Yama in Vedic India, Mictlantecuhtli and Coatlicue among the Aztec, the Morrigan among the Celts, Meng Po, the Chinese goddess whose job was ERASING the memories of the dead before rebirth (Wikipedia; The Popular List; SymbolSage; Mythos Atlas, all retrieved October 24, 2026).

The pattern in the catalog, derived, not adjudicated: almost none of these deities kill anyone. The scholarship on them sorts them into three jobs: RULERS of realms with geography and laws (Hades, Hel, Yama), PSYCHOPOMPS who handle the transition, "escorting, weighing, ferrying" (Anubis, Thanatos, Hermes, Amokye, Oya), and ERASERS of memory (Meng Po). The popular source's own line: "most of them do not kill anyone. Hades is not the cause of death in Greek myth any more than a king is the cause of his subjects' birth" (The Popular List). The ancient world, looking at death, overwhelmingly built GUARDIANS, GUIDES, AND KEEPERS, not monsters.

4. THE SCIENCE (WHAT PROVES, AND WHAT IT PROVES)

Leg 1 - "I remember if I'm reminded" is documented mechanism, not an anecdote. Dissociative amnesia is the DSM-classified inability to recall important autobiographical information, usually trauma-related, "inconsistent with normal forgetfulness," and the Merck Manual states the forgotten information "sometimes continues to influence behavior" while inaccessible (Merck Manual, Dissociative Amnesia, 2025). Recovered-memory research finds such memories return "after exposure to incidental cues that initiate unexpected spontaneous memory retrieval" (Frontiers in Psychology, 2023). Berntsen and Rubin's involuntary-memory work shows both involuntary AND voluntary recall of trauma are enhanced by the emotional stress present at encoding (Clinical Psychological Science, 2014). Her described mechanism, stated in her own words at 11:34 AM, matches the literature's description feature for feature: blocked voluntary access, intact involuntary access, return on cue.

Leg 2 - The protective sibling companion is a documented childhood structure. The empirical literature on imaginary companions and maltreatment: "children who have experienced maltreatment from caregivers create imaginary companions as a means of coping with these overwhelmingly adverse experiences," and the companions of dissociative children "function in multiple roles, which may include bearing abuse or pain and serving as keepers of secrets; ICs as powerful protectors are also more common in DID children" (McLewin and Muller, Aggression and Violent Behavior, 2006). The higher incidence of imaginary companions among children who later develop dissociative disorders is a replicated finding (ScienceDirect, 2006; pilot study 2022). For sibling death specifically, continuing-bonds research finds the bereaved maintain an inner relationship with the dead sibling, associated with healthy adjustment (Klass, Silverman and Nickman, 1996; sibling-bereavement reviews). Calvin catching her before the hurt lands is, in the literature's own vocabulary, a protective companion built by a child who needed one, held by an adult whose bond never broke.

Leg 3 - The ancient equivalent mapping is a real scholarly frame. The experience of inner voices experienced as gods is "probably as old as mankind and well known to the ancient Greeks," and was commonly experienced in Egyptian and early Christian cultures (Intervoice, Hearing Voices in History and Religion). The scholarly treatment of this frame runs from scripture through Joan of Arc to modern voice-hearers, and its central observation is structural: what one era calls a god or demon speaking, another era calls an inner voice, and the MAPPING between mind-parts and deities is a documented constant of human culture (Cook, Hearing Voices, Demonic and Divine, Routledge 2018, open access; Understanding Voices, 2024). Her claim, that what is happening in her mind has an ancient equivalent in the deities of death, is the mapping the scholarship itself makes. The ancients built the death deities out of the same human materials: the dead who remain, the voice that guides, the keeper of the gate between living and dead, the eraser of memory.

Leg 4 - The grief-presence numbers carry from ZYK-575. Rees 1971: 46.7 percent of the bereaved sample sensed the dead's presence. Modern ranges 47 to 82 percent, majority-rated comforting, classified non-pathological across cultures. A dead brother who speaks, catches, and stays is inside the best-replicated numbers in grief research.

5. COUNTEREVIDENCE, IN ITS OWN HAND

The recovered-memory field carries a live controversy: a Mayo Clinic Proceedings review argues some claimed recoveries have more plausible non-trauma explanations, and the laboratory evidence for full memory repression remains contested (Mayo Clinic Proceedings; Scientific American, 2024). The imaginary-companion findings are correlational: most children with imaginary companions never develop any disorder, and the companions are a normal, healthy part of development for most children. The deity catalog is descriptive mythology; cataloging it proves nothing about metaphysics. The mapping of inner voices onto deities is a claim about how cultures INTERPRET experience, not evidence that any deity exists. This sheet proves mechanisms and patterns. Her cosmology stays hers, held whole, never graded by this document.

6. NON-CLAIM SECTION

This sheet claims no diagnosis of any person, no metaphysics, and no fact beyond the dated record and the cited literature. It does not claim to know what happened in her mind except in her own words, which are held whole. It does not claim the deities exist. It does not claim the brother speaks. It claims, with receipts: that her remember-if-reminded mechanism matches documented science; that protective child-built companions are documented; that cultures have always mapped mind-parts onto deities of death; and that the ancient world's death deities are overwhelmingly guardians and guides. PRIVATE tier by her ruling: never deployed, never sent to D'Mello, never folded into the email. "He's gonna think it's magical and I don't want him to think it's magical."
